

STEP ONE

THE FOUNDATION OF RECOVERY FOR COMPULSIVE GAMBLING

FIRST STEP: POWERLESSNESS AND UNMANAGEABILITY

Part 1: “We admitted we were powerless over gambling - ...”

This is the first part of Step One of the Gamblers Anonymous Program. It is very significant that the founders of the G.A. Program placed the emphasis on powerlessness over gambling.

Many times we have observed people taking powerlessness for granted or with a casual attitude UNDERSTANDING POWERLESSNESS MUST BE THE FOUNDATION for any successful approach to recovery from compulsive gambling.

Accepting powerlessness can be compared to laying the foundation of a building. A foundation has to be solid for the building to stand. A thorough understanding of our individual powerlessness must be solidly and firmly founded or we will fail to arrest our addiction.

Some people we see in the program have the attitude, “If I can discover why I gambled, I’ll be O.K.” For example, we often hear, “My only problem is my job - I’m not getting raises fast enough; my spouse is spending more than I am making; no one understands that I have to gamble to make ends meet”. Some people blame a neighbor or a neighborhood. The most common example we hear is, “I really don’t have a problem with gambling. I’m just having a little run of bad luck”. With such attitudes, the compulsive gambler is failing to see the psychological influences powerlessness has over his addiction.

We cannot deny that there is a psychological dependency upon gambling. Psychological dependency is verified by the medical profession and it is important to stress the psychological aspects of addiction. To be specific, as dependent people, we have an “urge” to gamble. We all probably started gambling for many of the same reasons: to relax, to have fun, to make money. But not one of us started gambling with the express purpose of becoming a compulsive gambler.

When we talk of “urge” for the gambling dependent person, we need to be aware that it can and does surpass all other urges. The urge to repeat the experience of becoming high is so strong that we will forsake many, if not all, of our responsibilities and values. We have thrown away things that are seemingly most important to us (such as families, jobs, personal welfare, respect and integrity) in order to satisfy the urge to gamble. We remember the good times and occasional big wins we undoubtedly had during the early stages of our gambling and the psychological urge to repeat those experiences arises. Once the urge exists, it becomes totally self-sufficient, and will come to us in and of its own accord. We do not continually think of gambling, but the urge to gamble can occur at any time.

Reluctance to examine our powerlessness is as much a symptom of our illness as withdrawal, or digestive disorder. We often tell ourselves and others, “but I don’t need to gamble; I don’t gamble all the time”. Social pressures centered on the myth that “willpower is all that is needed to control a gambling problem” can result in unwillingness to study our powerlessness.

The social image of being macho or financially independent is very demanding. It is not easy for people to admit powerlessness over anything, especially if they have not experienced the social disapproval of uncontrolled gambling.

Negative attitudes are changing, however, with the gradual public acceptance of compulsive gambling as a disease. But the change is coming more slowly for the acceptance of some. Many times, when talking with families of dependent people, we have heard, "Thank goodness it's only a gambling problem and not drug addiction". This kind of social attitude may interfere with people seeking the necessary help to control their addictions until a major crisis arises in their lives due to family discord, job difficulties, or loss of self-respect and self-worth.

Often the stress and strain of daily life, gambling losses, family problems, job hassles and other factors directly relate to the continued gambling. This further demonstrates powerlessness in our lives.

An honest look at these symptoms will help us understand powerlessness. It will also help us deal with the self-deceiving shadow of fear that surrounds our compulsive gambling.

Understanding and accepting powerlessness is a way to freedom. We will be releasing ourselves from the insanity, the loss of respect and the loss of interest in activities that have been important in our lives. We will be freed of the necessity to withstand the depression due to our gambling. We will lose the faulty thinking (the deceit and lying that becomes so much a part of us that we begin to believe our own lies). We will become less subject to the moral deterioration and the loss of regard for our individual value systems. Ask yourself, "What am I really giving up?" You are really giving up misery, pain, discomfort and a fight for mere existence in your life.

Dependent people have an X-factor. This is a physical powerlessness. The X-factor is so-called because no one knows exactly what it is or why it exists. Many studies have been, and are being made, but so far, none have explained why some people become compulsive gamblers.

It is important to know that we are not responsible for the X-factor. For some reason, we respond with intense pleasure during our first stages of gambling. This pleasure or effect is what allows us to develop the psychological dependency on gambling. This same effect could have taken place while drinking or using drugs and the same results would occur.

Dependency. Non-compulsive gamblers may reach a level of pleasure while gambling, but the length of time that the pleasure sensation is maintained is much shorter than for those of us who eventually become dependent on gambling. This may be a result of the X-factor. It is a fact of our existence. Similarly, some of us develop a heart condition or diabetes, some of us become dependant on alcohol, drugs or gambling and some of us don't. Understanding the X-factor and powerlessness is essential in helping us overcome the moral implication and social stigmas which imply that compulsive gamblers are bad or wicked or weak-willed. It is very important to understand that we are not bad people trying to become good, but sick people trying to get well.

As we continue in recovery, we will begin to develop a program and a deeper understanding of how to live with compulsive gambling when we understand it to be an illness we are not personally responsible for having. It is a progressive illness, and one that is more likely to destroy us than any other illness. If it is not arrested, it will destroy us totally as a person; not only physically and emotionally, but spiritually as well.

As we develop a thorough understanding of compulsive gambling, we will begin to understand our personal powerlessness over the illness. We will not be ashamed to admit that we are powerless over it, just as we would be powerless over any other illness. We will also learn that we will not be able to adapt our lives to the illness of compulsive gambling unless we have a thorough, ongoing program of recovery in the same way that a diabetic or heart patient has an ongoing program to keep the disease in check.

Personal responsibility for compulsive gambling occurs when we have recognized it in ourselves, or others have pointed out the symptoms to us and we realize we are afflicted with an illness. It then becomes our responsibility to start a recovery program. At this point, it is self-defeating to condemn ourselves for being compulsive gamblers.

It is imperative that we study to understand personal powerlessness. It is apparent to me from my own history and from working with people in this field that what has helped us the most to identify powerlessness was taking an honest look at what gambling has done to us. Instead of living as free and natural people, we were reduced to fighting for survival in life.

The process of identifying powerlessness involves a certain amount of emotional pain, and dependent people seem to have a low threshold of tolerance for pain. Thus, it is so important that we have an atmosphere of care, concern, and reinforcement in G.A. and treatment programs. Dependent people seem to walk a tightrope in regard to the precariousness of their exact situation. We have to be made aware of the painful side of our gambling and then be given emotional support as we work through it. The need for the rest of the program is not diminished by stressing powerlessness. However, the significance of powerlessness in a personal recovery program is the essential foundation of recovery.

Part 2: ...“that our lives had become unmanageable”

Unmanageability is related to powerlessness. Many types of social pressures and stress prevent us from completely directing our own lives. There are two forms of unmanageability: social and personal.

Social unmanageability directly follows the act of compulsive gambling. There is little doubt that a compulsive gambler, after a loss, driving an automobile down the street is unmanageable. Someone who is gambling all hours of the day and night is pushing his or her body beyond the point of physical exhaustion. This person is unmanageable.

Unmanageability may be obvious in the number of bounced checks, white collar crimes, family arguments or fights before or after gambling episodes, but this behavior is not unique to the compulsive gambler. Any person who gambles as much or as often as we do would act in the same manner. Often such behavior can readily be pointed out in many people's past. Think back to the missed family gatherings, birthdays and other social events that were missed due to gambling. Such behavior definitely could be classified as unmanageability.

Our addiction directly affects every area of our lives. Our emotions and behavior become affected. In the area of job, lost hours and shirked responsibilities are due to gambling. Many people want to deny the total effect of their gambling. A fairly popular idea in our society is that gambling is the “demon” in our lives. We respect that view, but to a very limited degree. We are more inclined to stress the idea that it is we alone that cause most of our problems, and not gambling. The gambling will not bring destruction upon a person until that person learns not to justify continual use and abuse of gambling.

Personal unmanageability relates to the attitudes and beliefs that we have about ourselves, our environment, and the people we live with. In many cases, personal unmanageability was present many years before compulsive gambling.

G.A. philosophy is that stopping gambling is not enough. We need to rejuvenate our personalities. We have to learn about ourselves on an intimate level. We have to discover what the G.A. program calls “our character defects” and “shortcomings” in order to accept ourselves as human beings with strong and weak points just like everyone else. There are some character weaknesses that compulsive gamblers do seem to have in common. One is self-centeredness. This defect has to be present in each of us for our illness to prosper. Selfishness seems to need a direct assault to break our denial system and rebuild trust in our concern for other people.

Another area of common personal unmanageability is the basic immaturity that seems to be prevalent among compulsive gamblers. It causes us to respond to life in a self-defeating way. Immature behavior can also occur when we are not gambling.

Immaturity may not be obvious. A person may be able to function very well when not gambling, but the least amount of agitation or disruption of the normal pattern will cause extreme reaction. Overreacting is definitely immature. Any behavior that would result in diminishing self-respect or dignity is also immature. Some examples are temper tantrums, not sharing feelings and emotions honestly with others, insisting on having one’s own way and the like. Such behavior patterns enlarge and gradually take over a large part of one’s personality.

Personal manageability covers a wide range of behavior patterns because of the many variables within each person. We do have, however, basic common desires. We want to love and be loved. We want to feel worthwhile as people and in our everyday life. Fulfilling these desires can be much easier if we meet life on life’s terms instead of trying to battle and mold life into our own specifications.

The realization that life is bigger than any of us may be hard to accept at first. Acceptance of the first step and all of its implications will help us learn to try different types of behavior, and it will lead to attitude and value changes which will allow us to become comfortable with ourselves and others.

We challenge everyone reading this pamphlet to join the rest of us in the marvelous experience of becoming more aware of ourselves, our reactions to life, and the realization of our potential as persons. This can come naturally with continued work on the 12 Steps of the G.A. Program, which is based on understanding and accepting powerlessness and unmanageability.
